FOREWORD

IN presenting this collection to the public it seems timely to give an account of the causes which have brought the Whitney Museum of American Art into existence.

In 1904 Gertrude V. Whitney, recognizing the difficulties which faced the artist in gaining an audience for his work, opened two galleries in her Studio building on Eighth Street where for six years artists of talent were invited to show their work. These exhibitions were open to the public and were attended with gratifying results. Among the artists who first exhibited and helped to make these galleries known in the world of art were Robert Henri, George Bellows, George Luks, John Sloan, Ernest Lawson, Allen Tucker, Cecil Howard, Jo Davidson, Paul Man-ship and James E. Fraser.

So successful was this first venture that in 1914 the Whitney Studio Club was formed with quarters on Fourth Street in an old house renovated to suit the Club's purposes, with a library, a meeting room and three fine galleries. Here the members not only exhibited their work but found a place where they could meet, exchange opinions and gain inspiration from one another. The Club included in its membership not only artists who had already risen to fame, but many of the younger men who showed their work for the first time at the Club's exhibitions.

During ten years of its existence, it numbered among its members most of the leading spirits in American art. Many of these younger men who joined have since made their reputations and are now profiting by their careers in the Club.

In 1927, with a membership of 400 and a waiting list of a like number, an impasse had been reached. To enlarge the membership of the Club would have been to make it an unwieldy organization; to refuse admission to worth-while applicants would have been contrary to the principle upon which the Club was founded. It was therefore decided to disband, and the Whitney Studio Galleries were formed with the purpose of providing a place where artists could exhibit independently of dealers and of official connections.

The Gallery continued for three years, actively engaged in the showing and selling of invited pictures. It became evident at this time that the purpose had been accomplished for which the Club and the Gallery had been formed. A real interest had been fostered in American art. Many dealers who had formerly been slow to recognize the new forces in American art were now interested. They were as eager as we to find new talent and better equipped in every case to provide an avenue for sales.

After much consideration it was decided that what was most needed was an organization unhampered by official restrictions, but with the prestige which a museum invariably carries—an organization which would purchase and exhibit under the most auspicious circumstances native works of art.

This need Mrs. Whitney has met by opening the Whitney Museum of American Art, presenting as a nucleus her own collection of more than 600 works purchased over a period of twenty-five years. This Museum will be devoted to the difficult but important task of gaining for the art of this country the prestige which heretofore the public has devoted too exclusively to the art of foreign countries and of the past.

To make effective Mrs. Whitney's constructive contribution to the aesthetic growth of our country we rely on the same splendid cooperation which the artist and the public have accorded our former efforts in behalf of American art.

JULIANA R. FORCE, Director
Whitney Museum of American Art

INTRODUCTION

THE WHITNEY MUSEUM OF AMERICAN ART embodies in permanent form an idea that has been in active operation for more than a decade through the agencies of the Whitney Studio Club and the Whitney Studio Gallery. The results accomplished by these organizations were so efficacious in discovering new talent and breaking down the wall of indifference that surrounded native effort in the arts, that because of its background, this Museum has the rather unusual distinction of embracing in its collection work which, in a measure, it has helped to create.

The idea back of this institution and its predecessors is based upon the belief that America has an important contribution to make in the arts, that in order to make this contribution effective, a sympathetic environment must be created in which the artist may function to the fullest extent of his powers. Motivated by such a belief it is natural that the Whitney Museum of American Art should be primarily concerned with the work of living artists.

The limitations of space at our disposal and our preoccupation with contemporary expression, do not permit us to show an extended and complete view of the past in American art. It is the province of the older, established museums to supply the entire historical background, an obligation which they admirably fulfill. However, at the present time we include in our collection a few works by artists of the immediate past not only because of their inherent qualities as works of art, but because these particular artists have left a marked impression upon their times and are to a certain degree, precursors of various tendencies which may be observed in the art of our own day. Upon this basis other outstanding works of the past by artists who are most truly representative of their period will be acquired, so that eventually the collection will summarize achievement in American art to an extent sufficient to establish whatever relationship may exist between the past and present.

If our national background in the arts seems in spots to be rather vague and meagre, it may be attributed, to a certain extent, to a lack felt in the past of those qualities of appreciation and encouragement which allow art to develop normally and independently, qualities which it will be the endeavor of this Museum to inject into the stream of living art.

By the intensive means we have indicated of adding to the collection representative works of the past we shall fill in the background of American art, but our chief concern will be with the present and future. In short, it is our desire to help create rather than to conserve a tradition.

In limiting the scope of this Museum to American art we place the emphasis primarily on "art" and secondarily on "American." The works in this collection were acquired for their value as art and were judged by those fundamental qualities that underlie all true expression of the art spirit.

No doubt, judged by strictly aesthetic standards, art is universal; but art is not created in a vacuum; the artist is a human being, subject to all the currents of experience that influence his fellow-man. Among the most powerful of these influences are racial and national traits, and these elements added to the more abstract, aesthetic qualities give to art an extra pungency and vigor which we shall attempt to recognize and encourage.

In a country without a strong background of traditional art to throw into sharp relief contemporary expression, where diverse racial strains are inextricably woven into the texture of American character, the problem of recognizing indigenous traits as they appear in art is unusually complicated but not insuperable. We shall not attempt to simplify the question by defining in absolute terms the essence of the American spirit and requiring artists to conform to that definition. It would be presumptuous to point out the road upon which art must travel. We look to the artist to lead the way, permitting him the utmost liberty as to the direction in which he shall go. As a museum, we conceive it to be our duty to see that he is not hampered in his progress by lack of sympathy and support. It is not our intention to form a "school," our chief concern is with the individual artist who is working out his destiny in this country, believing that if he is truly expressing himself, his art will inevitably reflect the character of his environment.

Acquired upon the basis and for the purposes which we have mentioned, the Whitney Museum of American Art presents to the public a collection, for the most part by living artists, of some five hundred paintings in oil and water-color, one hundred fifteen pieces of sculpture, drawings, etchings, lithographs and works in other mediums, to the number of seven hundred. The collection, while comprehensive, is not complete and forms only a nucleus of an ever-growing organism. By means of frequent acquisitions, the Museum will keep pace with every vital manifestation in contemporary American art, and in order that the public may keep in touch with these developments, exhibitions of recent acquisitions will be held from time to time.

To supplement the permanent collection, temporary exhibitions will be placed on view, designed to reflect various aspects of both the past and present in American art. Travelling exhibitions will be organized and sent to a number of centers in this country and abroad.

The program of present and future activities also includes lectures on every phase of art, and the publication of books on subjects pertaining to art in general and to American art in particular. At the present time, seventeen volumes of the group of books known as the "American Artists Series" will be in circulation coincident with the opening of the Museum. Thirteen others of this series are in preparation for publication in 1932.

In this Introduction to our first catalogue we have briefly outlined some of our ideas and purposes and have indicated the methods by which we hope to give them reality. We shall not attempt a critical estimate of the works contained in the collection—we prefer that they should speak for themselves. If we have defined our attitude clearly, it will be obvious that we do not claim that every work in this collection embodies those enduring values which survive through the ages, but we are certain that each work, to a greater or less degree, is impregnated by a spark of vitality, which will give it significance to our own generation and we believe that certain of these works are so rich in vital elements, that from them future generations will draw sustenance and inspiration.
